The Isle of Man Flag

The flag of the Isle of Man, known in Manx as 'brattagh Vannin', is a distinctive symbol of this self-governing British Crown dependency. The flag features a triskelion, which is composed of three armored legs with golden spurs, set against a red background. This emblem has been the official flag since 1 December 1932 and is deeply rooted in the island's history, drawing from the Manx coat of arms that dates back to the 13th century. The triskelion itself is an ancient symbol, with connections to various cultures over the millennia, including the Mycenaeans and Lycians. Its adoption by the Isle of Man is believed to be linked to the island's governance transition in 1265, from the Norse-ruled Crovan dynasty to Scottish and then English rule. The symbol may have been influenced by similar motifs found in Sicilian heraldry, reflecting the island's complex cultural tapestry woven through centuries of Norse, Scottish, and English influence. The flag's design was standardized in 1966, ensuring consistency in its representation. Today, the Manx triskelion stands as one of the oldest continually used government symbols, a testament to the Isle of Man's rich history and enduring identity.
